Martin Luther and the AntiChrist

Dennis Pettibone
Southern Adventist University

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.andrews.edu/pd
Part of the History of Christianity Commons, and the Religious Thought, Theology and Philosophy of Religion Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://digitalcommons.andrews.edu/pd/vol13/iss2/1

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Commons @ Andrews University. It has been accepted for inclusion in Perspective Digest by an authorized editor of Digital Commons @ Andrews University. For more information, please contact repository@andrews.edu.
On “The Well Women Revisited”
(PD 2007:4)

It has been said that feminism is the radical notion that women are people. To that end, as we revisit the “well women,” I’d strongly urge that we truly take a critical, unbiased look, and not simply replace our biases for others.

With that caution out of the way, Davidson’s presentation of many of the “well women” we take for granted is enlightening and truly thought-provoking. In the end, perhaps that is what’s most needed. In reading Davidson’s account of Jesus’ encounter with the Samaritan woman at the well, it appears to me that the commentators are the ones oppressing women and propagating false images through time.

Indeed, we would all do well to check our assumptions. Does our image of Father God allow for the numerous places where “He” has revealed “His” nature through inspired writers as that of a suckling mother or other such feminine images?

We would be well served, then, to truly approach Scripture without bias—whether it be feminist, cultural, or even that which is “traditionally” Christian. Let us open our minds to what it is God has to reveal to us, allowing the Word to transform our lives and not vice versa.

Kaaryn Sanon
Baltimore, Maryland

Jo Ann Davidson in “The Well Women Revisited” reminds us of the matter of mistreatment, subjugation, and denigration of women in societies across the world despite the breaking of the glass ceiling in Western societies and the fact that women in some Eastern countries are power brokers. Thankfully, it is not all men who treat women disparagingly, and men in general, especially Christian gentlemen, need to scrutinize the methods Christ used both in word and deed so as to inform them as to how they need to act toward others.

I’m glad she reminds us that despite my status in life, my God still regards me as an equally created being, and He speaks to me “without prejudice,” just as He did the women He met and conversed with.

Thank God, my heavenly Father says He can use me just as He did the well women if I dedicate myself to Him, because I, too, am called, and despite my gender, He talks to me and I understand, and can act according to His will.

Beverly Henry
Mandeville, Jamaica

A study of the Reformer’s interpretation of scriptural prophecies has serious considerations for today.

In the warm ecumenical afterglow of Vatican II, Martin Luther’s identification of the papacy as the antichrist of Bible prophecy is often seen as narrow-minded, bigoted, and even unchristian. His view, which until recently was shared by a broad spectrum of conservative evangelical Protestants, is now seen as an embarrassment by some members of churches that retain this interpretation. It is no longer socially acceptable to describe the papacy as the fulfillment of a collection of prophecies regarding a powerful spiritual tyranny.

Even the United States Congress has put itself on record regarding this issue. In 2000, Congress passed a joint resolution condemning Bob Jones University for promoting this belief.

The politicians who passed that resolution were probably unaware that they were undermining the historical foundations of Protestantism.

If Protestantism owes its very existence to Luther’s conviction that

Dennis Pettibone, Ph.D., is Professor of History at Southern Adventist University, Collegedale, Tennessee.
Luther’s target was not the papacy; it was a greedy Dominican monk named Johann Tetzel who was distorting Catholic doctrine by exaggerating the benefits of indulgences. Luther had no intention of splitting the church: he was only trying to protect his parishioners.

Soon to replace Staupitz as the head of the Augustinian order in Germany, asking him to evaluate, on the basis of some of his writings, whether his early suspicions that Rome was the center of the true antichrist.

A few months later, Luther wrote to his friend and former student Georg Spalatin, chaplain and secretary to Elector Frederick of Saxony, telling him that he had been studying papal decretals in preparation for the upcoming disputation at Leipzig. He added, “Confidentially, I do not know whether the Pope is Antichrist himself or his apostle, so miserably is Christ (that is, the truth) corrupted and crucified by the Pope in the decretals.”

In July 1519, at the Leipzig debate with Johann Eck for which Luther had been preparing, Luther took the position that both popes and church councils could err, averring that everything should be subject to the judgment of Scripture. He would soon be using Scripture to pass judgment on the Pope.

Luther read two things the following year that lessened his hesitation about calling the Pope antichrist. First, in February 1520, he read Lorenzo Valla’s demonstration that the Donation of Constantine—the document on which Rome based its claim as supreme in the Western World—was a forgery. This seems to have inspired another letter to...
Luther’s target was not the papacy; it was a greedy Dominican monk named Johann Tetzel who was distorting Catholic doctrine by exaggerating the benefits of indulgences. Luther had no intention of splitting the church: he was only trying to protect his parishioners.

the papacy was the antichrist, it might be instructive to inquire how he came to this conclusion. He did, in fact, come to this view slowly and reluctantly, driven by historical circumstances and theological reflection.

It is important to focus primarily on Luther because it was his views on the subject that triggered the Protestant Reformation. It should be noted, however, that he was far from the first person to hold this view. He himself credited John Huss with being the first to call the Pope an antichrist.1 Huss did indeed consider the Pope to be the antichrist, but he was not the first to do so, nor was his mentor, John Wycliffe, although Wycliffe and at least some of his Lollard followers, including Sir John Oldcastle, held this belief. This idea also circulated among the Waldensians, the Albigensians, and the Franciscans, a group of Franciscans with more regard for the rule of St. Francis than for papal authority.

But even earlier than that, back in 991, Bishop Arnulf of Orleans, describing papal murder, lust, and intrigue, asked, “Are there any bold enough to maintain that the priests of the Lord over all the world are to take their law from monsters of guilt like these?”2 When a person so deficient in virtue sits on the papal throne, Arnulf suggested that he must “be the Antichrist, sitting in the temple of God, and showing himself as God.”3

Martin Luther was probably unaware of the previous attacks on the papacy when, in 1517, he drafted his 95 Theses. If he had been, he would have been unsympathetic. At the time, he regarded John Huss a heretic. His target was not the papacy; it was a greedy Dominican monk named Johann Tetzel who was distorting Catholic doctrine by exaggerating the benefits of indulgences. Luther had no intention of splitting the church; he was only trying to protect his parishioners.

Enraged, Tetzel made sure that Rome knew what was happening. This set in motion a chain of events that led to a summons for Luther to appear before a papal legate. He came to this conclusion. He did, if he refused to recant, but Luther—mindful of the fate of John Huss—avoided arrest by stealing away from Augsburg on the night of October 16, 1518.

First Hesitant Steps
Luther had read Prierias’ assertions of papal infallibility and had experienced Cajetan’s reliance on tradition, refusal to discuss Scriptures, and implicit threats of force. Now he began to consider the possibility that these men might be serving antichrist. On December 18, 1518, he wrote to Wenzeslaus Link, soon to replace Staufitz as the head of the Augustinian order in Germany, asking him to evaluate, on the basis of some of his writings, whether his early suspicions that Rome was the center of the true antichrist.

A few months later, Luther wrote to his friend and former student Georg Spalatin, chaplain and secretary to Elector Frederick of Saxony, telling him that he had been studying papal decrees in preparation for the upcoming disputation at Leipzig. He added, “Confidentially, I do not know whether the Pope is Antichrist himself or his apostle, so miserably is Christ (that is, the truth) corrupted and crucified by the Pope in the decreets.”4

In July 1519, at the Leipzig debate with Johann Eck for which Luther had been preparing, Luther took the position that both popes and church councils could err, averring that everything should be subject to the judgment of Scripture. He would soon be using Scripture to pass judgment on the Pope.

Luther read two things the following year that lessened his hesitation about calling the Pope antichrist. First, in February 1520, he read Lorenzo Valla’s demonstration that the Donation of Constantine—the document on which Rome based its claim as supreme in the Western World—was a forgery. This seems to have inspired another letter to

Pettibone: Martin Luther and the AntiChrist

Published by Digital Commons @ Andrews University, 2008
Spalatin (February 24, 1520): “I am practically cornered, and can hardly doubt any more that the Pope really is the Antichrist . . . because everything so exactly corresponds to his life, action, words, and commandments.”

After reading Valla’s treatise, Luther, hesitantly at first, began to say publicly what he had previously written privately to friends. Augustine Altveld was a monk in Leipzig who asserted that the Bible supported total papal control of the church and that submission to the Pope was essential for the operation of effective government. Luther responded early in 1520 with On the Papacy in Rome Against the Famous Romanist at Leipzig. This publication mentioned several reasons for possibly considering Rome to be the antichrist. “It is said that the Antichrist shall find the treasures of the earth,” Luther wrote, suggesting that the “insufferable Roman thieves” were finding their treasure by exploiting the Germans, and quoting what he said was a Roman proverb: “Squeeze the gold from the German fools, in any way you can.”

Luther then raised the issue of papal infallibility. Expressing a willingness to accept anything the Pope decreed after first testing it by the Bible, he contrasted this position with that of “Roman knaves” who placed the Pope “above Christ” and made him “a judge over the Scriptures” and said that he was infallible. If the Pope expected Christians to place their faith in something visible (himself) rather than that which was invisible, Luther concluded, “I would say right out that he is the real Antichrist.” Notice that in neither of these statements did Luther directly say that either the Pope or the papacy was the antichrist, but he raised the possibility.

The second source that weakened his hesitancy to openly declare that the Pope was antichrist was Prierias’ second treatise against Luther’s teachings. Reprising his earlier arguments that the Pope had more authority than either Scriptures or church councils, Prierias quoted a passage of canon law that horrified Luther: “The Pope could not be deposed from office even if he were so scandalously bad that he led multitudes of souls to the devil.”

Address to the Christian Nobility

Now Luther’s pen began to fly. First came Address to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation Concerning the Reform of the Christian Estate, which went to press June 13, 1520. Early in this treatise, a book that repeatedly linked the papacy and antichrist, came Luther’s reaction to Prierias’ appalling statement: “On this accursed and devilish foundation they build at Rome, and think that we should let all the world go to the devil, rather than resist their knavery. . . . It is to be feared that this is a game of Antichrist or a sign that he is close at hand.”

Luther then suggested calling a free church council and said if the Pope tried to block this, he would be hindering the church’s edification, thus violating 2 Corinthians 10:8, which Luther paraphrased as, “God has given us authority not for the destruction but for the edification of Christendom.” Then Luther said, “It is only the power of the devil and of Antichrist which resists the things that serve for the edification of Christendom.” If the Pope claimed the “power to interpret the Scriptures by mere authority,” that would—like trying to prevent or control a church council—be evidence that the papacy was “in truth the communion of Antichrist and of the devil,” Luther said.

Quoting Christ’s warning in Matthew 24 about false prophets deceiving the elect, Luther said miracles were no proof of papal authority. He said 2 Thessalonians 2:9 had predicted that antichrist would use deceit through Satan’s power.

He also attacked as “the very works of the very Antichrist” papal claims to power over earthly authorities and even over angels. Reminding his readers that Jesus said His kingdom was not “of this world,” Luther bluntly said, “No vicar’s rule can go beyond his lord’s.” These “over-presumptuous” claims were devil-devised devices to facilitate bringing in Antichrist and raising “the Pope above God, as many are already doing.”

Commenting on the report that the Pope had prevented the Bishop of Strassburg from implementing moral reform in his diocese, Luther said, “Thus priests are to be encouraged against their own bishop, and their disobedience to divine law is to be protected! Antichrist himself, I hope, will not dare to put God to such open shame.”
Spalatin (February 24, 1520): “I am practically cornered, and can hardly doubt any more that the Pope really is the Antichrist . . . because everything so exactly corresponds to his life, action, words, and commandments.”

After reading Valla’s treatise, Luther, hesitantly at first, began to say publicly what he had previously written privately to friends. Augustine Altveld was a monk in Leipzig who asserted that the Bible supported total papal control of the church and that submission to the Pope was essential for the operation of effective government. Luther responded early in 1520 with On the Papacy in Rome Against the Famous Romanist at Leipzig. This publication mentioned several reasons for possibly considering Rome to be the antichrist. “It is said that the Antichrist shall find the treasures of the earth,” Luther wrote, suggesting that the “insufferable Roman thieves” were finding their treasure by exploiting the Germans, and quoting what he said was a Roman proverb: “Squeeze the gold from the German fools, in any way you can.”

Luther then raised the issue of papal infallibility. Expressing a willingness to accept anything the Pope decreed after first testing it by the Bible, he contrasted this position with that of “Roman knaves” who placed the Pope “above Christ” and made him “a judge over the Scriptures” and said that he was infallible. If the Pope expected Christians to place their faith in something visible (himself) rather than that which was invisible, Luther concluded, “I would say right out that he is the real Antichrist.” Notice that in neither of these statements did Luther directly say that either the Pope or the papacy was the antichrist, but he raised the possibility.

The second source that weakened his hesitancy to openly declare that the Pope was antichrist was Prierias’ second treatise against Luther’s teachings. Reprising his earlier arguments that the Pope had more authority than either Scriptures or church councils, Prierias quoted a passage of canon law that horrified Luther: The Pope could not be deposed from office even if he “were so scandalously bad that he led multitudes of souls to the devil.”

Address to the Christian Nobility

Now Luther’s pen began to fly. First came Address to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation Concerning the Reform of the Christian Estate, which went to press June 13, 1520. Early in this treatise, a book that repeatedly linked the papacy and antichrist, came Luther’s reaction to Prierias’ appalling statement: “On this accursed and devilish foundation they build at Rome, and think that we should let all the world go to the devil, rather than resist their knavery. . . . It is to be feared that this is a game of Antichrist or a sign that he is close at hand.”

Luther then suggested calling a free church council and said if the Pope tried to block this, he would be hindering the church’s edification, thus violating 2 Corinthians 10:8, which Luther paraphrased as, “God has given us authority not for the destruction but for the edification of Christendom.” Then Luther said, “It is only the power of the devil and of Antichrist which resists the things that serve for the edification of Christendom.” If the Pope claimed the “power to interpret the Scriptures by mere authority,” that would—like trying to prevent or control a church council—be evidence that the papacy was “in truth the communion of Antichrist and of the devil,” Luther said.

Quoting Christ’s warning in Matthew 24 about false prophets deceiving the elect, Luther said miracles were no proof of papal authority. He said 2 Thessalonians 2:9 had predicted that antichrist would use deceit through Satan’s power.

He also attacked as “the very works of the very Antichrist” papal claims to power over earthly authorities and even over angels. Reminding his readers that Jesus said His kingdom was not “of this world,” Luther bluntly said, “No vicar’s rule can go beyond his lord’s.” These “over-presumptuous” claims were devil-devised devices to facilitate bringing in Antichrist and raising “the Pope above God, as many are already doing.”

Commenting on the report that the Pope had prevented the Bishop of Strassburg from implementing moral reform in his diocese, Luther said, “Thus priests are to be encouraged against their own bishop, and their disobedience to divine law is to be protected! Antichrist himself, I hope, will not dare to put God to such open shame.”
Luther then spoke of the corruption and immorality in Rome. “There is buying, selling, bartering, trading, trafficking, lying, deceiving, robbing, stealing, luxury, harlotry, knavery and every sort of contempt of God, and even the rule of Antichrist could not be more scandalous.”

He also complained of papal legates accepting money to “legalize unjust gain” and “dissolve oaths, vows, and agreements” while saying “the pope has authority to do this.” This alone, Luther said, was enough “to prove the pope the true Antichrist.”

By accepting money for annulling oaths, the Pope was saying “the pope has authority to do this. “ This alone, Luther said, was enough “to prove the pope the true Antichrist.”

Babylonian Captivity

In August, Luther learned that Leo was sending a bull threatening him with excommunication. With this, Richard Marius observes, “all ambiguity about the Antichrist evaporated from his mind; to him the pope was the Beast, the man of evil foretold in the New Testament, and no compromise was possible.”

After this, Luther published On the Babylon Captivity of the Church, which charged the papacy with leading church members into a new imprisonment. Criticizing those who claimed that the Pope had “the power to make laws,” Luther wrote, “Unless they will abandon their laws, and restore to Christ’s churches their liberty, they are guilty of all the souls that perish under this . . . captivity, and the papacy is of a truth the kingdom of Babylon, yea, of the very Antichrist.”

In addition, this booklet mentioned two specific reasons for calling the papacy antichrist. First, it had distorted the sacraments by withholding the Communion cup from the laity and, “with the wickedness of Antichrist,” calling it heresy for anyone to say it was necessary for laymen to have access to the cup as well as to the bread. Second was the annulment of legitimate marriages, of which Luther said, “I am incensed at that barefaced wickedness which is so ready to put asunder what God hath joined together that one may well scent Antichrist in it, for it opposes all that Christ has done and taught. What earthly reason is there in holding that no relative of a deceased husband, even to the fourth degree, may marry the latter’s widow?”

Luther wrote three other tracts that year that linked the papacy and antichrist. In Treatise on Christian Liberty he denounced the “soul destroying traditions of our popes” as “snares” by which “numberless souls” had “been dragged down to hell,” clearly “the work of Antichrist.”

In the Treatise on Usury he again discussed Rome’s antichrist-like financial exploitation of “German fools,” while in his Treatise on the New Testament he said in the context of the papal denial of the cup to the laity, “The pope . . . does not have a hair’s breadth of power to change what Christ has made, and whatever of these things he changes, . . . he does as a tyrant and Antichrist.”

The Pope expected his condemnation of Luther to trigger automatically his temporal punishment, probably by execution. Before his death, Emperor Maximilian I had promised Leo that he would enforce any papal verdict against Luther. On January 18, 1521, Leo ordered Maximilian’s successor, Charles V, to do likewise.

Luther’s Response to the Bull

The threatening bull, Exsurge Domine, primarily the work of Eck, Cajetan, and Prierias, denounced 44 of Luther’s published statements as “poisonous, offensive, misleading for godly and simple minds, uncharitable, counter to all reverence for the Holy Roman Church, the mother of the faithful and the mistress of the faith.” Condemning anyone holding or defending these positions, it warned Luther that he must return “to the bosom of the church” within 60 days. Meanwhile, it ordered that he keep silent and that his books be burned. After its arrival, on December 10 Luther burned it as well as books of canon law. Leo X signed the actual bull of excommunication on January 3, 1521, but for various reasons it was not delivered until much later.

The Pope expected his condemnation of Luther to trigger automatically his temporal punishment, probably by execution. Before his death, Emperor Maximilian I had promised Leo that he would enforce any papal verdict against Luther. On January 18, 1521, Leo ordered Maximilian’s successor, Charles V, to do likewise. Papal nuncio Girolamo Aleandro then tried to convince first Charles and then the Diet of Worms simply to condemn Luther without granting him a hearing.

Perspective Digest, Vol. 13 [2008], Iss. 2, Art. 1

http://digitalcommons.andrews.edu/pd/vol13/iss2/1
The Pope expected his condemnation of Luther to trigger automatically his temporal punishment, probably by execution. Before his death, Emperor Maximilian I had promised Leo that he would enforce any papal verdict against Luther. On January 18, 1521, Leo ordered Maximilian’s successor, Charles V, to do likewise.

Luther then spoke of the corruption and immorality in Rome. “There is buying, selling, bartering, trading, trafficking, lying, deceiving, robbing, stealing, luxury, harlotry, knavery and every sort of contempt of God, and even the rule of Antichrist could not be more scandalous.” He also complained of papal legates accepting money to “legalize unjust gain” and “dissolve oaths, vows, and agreements” while saying “the pope has authority to do this.” This alone, Luther said, was enough “to prove the pope the true Antichrist.” By accepting money for annulling oaths, the Pope was saying “the pope has authority to do this. ” This alone, Luther said, was enough “to prove the pope the true Antichrist.”

Babylonian Captivity

In August, Luther learned that Leo was sending a bull threatening him with excommunication. With this, Richard Marius observes, “all ambiguity about the Antichrist evaporated from his mind; to him the pope was the Beast, the man of evil foretold in the New Testament, and no compromise was possible.”

After this, Luther published On the Babylon Captivity of the Church, which charged the papacy with leading church members into a new imprisonment. Criticizing those who claimed that the Pope had “the power to make laws,” Luther wrote, “Unless they will abandon their laws, and restore to Christ’s churches their liberty, they are guilty of all the souls that perish under this . . . captivity, and the papacy is of a truth the kingdom of Babylon, yea, of the very Antichrist.”

In addition, this booklet mentioned two specific reasons for calling the papacy antichrist. First, it had distorted the sacraments by withholding the Communion cup from the laity and, “with the wickedness of Antichrist,” calling it heresy for anyone to say it was necessary for laymen to have access to the cup as well as to the bread. Second was the annulment of legitimate marriages, of which Luther said, “I am incensed at that barefaced wickedness which is so ready to put asunder what God hath joined together that one may well scent Antichrist in it, for it opposes all that Christ has done and taught. What earthly reason is there in holding that no relative of a deceased husband, even to the fourth degree, may marry the latter’s widow?”

Luther wrote three other tracts that year that linked the papacy and antichrist. In Treatise on Christian Liberty he denounced the “soul-destroying traditions of our popes” as “snares” by which “numberless souls” had “been dragged down to hell,” clearly “the work of Antichrist.”

In the Treatise on Usury he again discussed Rome’s antichrist-like financial exploitation of “German fools,” while in his Treatise on the New Testament he said in the context of the papal denial of the cup to the laity, “The pope . . . does not have a hair’s breadth of power to change what Christ has made, and whatever of these things he changes, . . . he does as a tyrant and Antichrist.”

Luther’s Response to the Bull

The threatening bull, Exsurge Domine, primarily the work of Eck, Cajetan, and Prierias, denounced 44 of Luther’s published statements as “poisonous, offensive, misleading for godly and simple minds, uncharitable, counter to all reverence for the Holy Roman Church, the mother of the faithful and the mistress of the faith.” Condemning anyone holding or defending these positions, it warned Luther that he must return “to the bosom of the church” within 60 days. Meanwhile, it ordered that he keep silent and that his books be burned. After its arrival, on December 10 Luther burned it as well as books of canon law. Leo X signed the actual bull of excommunication on January 3, 1521, but for various reasons it was not delivered until much later.

The Pope expected his condemnation of Luther to trigger automatically his temporal punishment, probably by execution. Before his death, Emperor Maximilian I had promised Leo that he would enforce any papal verdict against Luther. On January 18, 1521, Leo ordered Maximilian’s successor, Charles V, to do likewise. Papal nuncio Girolamo Aleandro then tried to convince first Charles and then the Diet of Worms simply to condemn Luther without granting him a hearing.
Meanwhile, replying to Exsurge Domine’s charges in his Defense and Explanation of All the Articles, Luther said, “Beware of the Antichrist, the Pope!” Arguing that Christ was the rock of Matthew 16:18, Luther said that interpreting this text to suggest papal authority perverted God’s Word. This, Luther continued, confirmed Paul’s prediction that antichrist’s entrance would be characterized by deceit and false scriptural interpretation. In this book he also called the Pope antichrist for giving people false assurance through indulgences, for denying that belief was required for forgiveness of sins, for spreading errors worldwide in exchange for “the wealth of the nations, and for imposing on people a system of contrition, confession, and satisfaction.”

Returning to the Communion issue, Luther said that Jesus gave both bread and wine to everyone and told everyone to repeat the ordinance in his name to recall his sacrifice. He assured them that after the meal and the ordinance, his self would lose his life. Nevertheless, when appearing before the imperial diet at Worms, he courageously refused to retract anything he had written unless convicted by Scripture or reason.

One of the statements Leo had condemned in Exsurge Domine was, “The burning of heretics is contrary to the will of the Holy Spirit.” Luther responded that papists had burned the “good Christians” John Huss and Jerome of Prague and “the pope and other heresy-hunters have burned other good Christians,” including “the godly man of Florence, . . . Girolomo Savonarola,” thus “fulfilling the prophecy concerning the Antichrist that he will cast Christians into the oven.” In this booklet Luther also condemned the error about the free will as “a peculiar teaching of Antichrist” and denounced the creation of mendicant orders as a ruse of the antichrist to increase his own power.

Having been twice condemned by the papacy, Luther’s life was clearly in jeopardy. Nevertheless, he opposed Ulrich von Hutten’s proposal to defend the new faith militarily. He fully expected, however, that he himself would lose his life. Nevertheless, when appearing before the imperial diet at Worms, he courageously refused to retract anything he had written unless convicted by Scripture or reason.

Now Luther introduced a new reason for calling the Pope antichrist, one to which he would repeatedly return in the future, the denial of the right of the clergy to marry. Speaking sympathetically of “the pitiable flock of fallen priests,” Luther said, “if the pope had brought about no other calamity than this prohibition of marriage, it would be sufficient to stamp him as antichrist, who is rightly called the man of sin and son of perdition.”

During his protective confinement at Wartburg Castle, he continued to describe the papacy as the antichrist: “St. Paul calls Antichrist the man of sin and the son of perdition, because through his precepts and laws he will turn all the world from God and prevent God and the world from coming together; he shall be a master of sin and all iniquity, and yet will retain the name and appearance of Christ and call himself Sanctimus and Vicarius Dei and Caput Ecclesiae [‘most holy one; vicar of God; head of the Church’], and persecute all who will not obey him. It is easy to recognize that the pope more than fits this description.”

Now Luther introduced a new reason for calling the Pope antichrist, one to which he would repeatedly return in the future, the denial of the right of the clergy to marry. Speaking sympathetically of “the pitiable flock of fallen priests,” Luther said, “if the pope had brought about no other calamity than this prohibition of marriage, it would be sufficient to stamp him as antichrist, who is rightly called the man of sin and son of perdition.”

Luther did not soften his characterization of the Pope as antichrist after the crisis had passed and he could feel reasonably secure under Frederick’s protection. Indeed, he expanded and strengthened this position. Of course, he could never feel
Meanwhile, replying to Exsurge Domine’s charges in his Defense and Explanation of All the Articles, Luther said, “Beware of the Antichrist, the Pope!”25 Arguing that Christ was the rock of Matthew 16:18, Luther said that interpreting this text to suggest papal authority perverted God’s Word. This, Luther continued, confirmed Paul’s prediction that antichrist’s entrance would be characterized by deceit and false scriptural interpretation. In this book he also called the Pope antichrist for giving people false assurance through indulgences, for denying that belief was required for forgiveness of sins, for spreading errors worldwide in exchange for “the wealth of the nations, and for imposing on people a system of contrition, confession, and satisfaction.”26

Returning to the Communion issue, Luther said that Jesus gave both bread and wine to everyone and told everyone to repeat the ordinance in His remembrance, but that the Pope said, “Beware of the Antichrist, the Pope!”25 Arguing that Christ was the rock of Matthew 16:18, Luther said that interpreting this text to suggest papal authority perverted God’s Word. This, Luther continued, confirmed Paul’s prediction that antichrist’s entrance would be characterized by deceit and false scriptural interpretation. In this book he also called the Pope antichrist for giving people false assurance through indulgences, for denying that belief was required for forgiveness of sins, for spreading errors worldwide in exchange for “the wealth of the nations, and for imposing on people a system of contrition, confession, and satisfaction.”26

One of the statements Leo had condemned in Exsurge Domine was, “The burning of heretics is contrary to the will of the Holy Spirit.” Luther responded that papists had burned the “good Christians” John Huss and Jerome of Prague and “the pope and other heresy-hunters have burned other good Christians,” including “the godly man of Florence, . . . Girolomo Savonarola,” thus “fulfilling the prophecy concerning the Antichrist that he will cast Christians into the oven.”29 In this booklet Luther also condemned “the error about the free will” as “a peculiar teaching of Antichrist”30 and denounced the creation of mendicant orders as a ruse of the antichrist to increase his own power.

To Worms and Wartburg (1521)

Having been twice condemned by the papacy, Luther’s life was clearly in jeopardy. Nevertheless, he opposed Ulrich von Hutten’s proposal to defend the new faith militarily. He fully expected, however, that he himself would lose his life. Nevertheless, when appearing before the imperial diet at Worms, he courageously refused to retract anything he had written unless convicted by Scripture or reason.

Now Luther introduced a new reason for calling the Pope antichrist, one to which he would repeatedly return in the future, the denial of the right of the clergy to marry. Speaking sympathetically of “the pitiable flock of fallen priests,” Luther said, “if the pope had brought about no other calamity than this prohibition of marriage, it would be sufficient to stamp him as antichrist, who is rightly called the man of sin and son of perdition, and the abomination, so much sin and perdition have followed in the wake of this one law.”31

During his protective confinement at Wartburg Castle, he continued to describe the papacy as the antichrist: “St. Paul calls Antichrist the man of sin and the son of perdition, because through his precepts and laws he will turn all the world from God and prevent God and the world from coming together; he shall be a master of sin and all iniquity, and yet will retain the name and appearance of Christ and call himself Sanctimus and Vicarius Dei and Caput Ecclesiae [‘most holy one; vicar of God; head of the Church’], and persecute all who will not obey him. It is easy to recognize that the pope more than fits this description.”31

Usurping God’s Place

Luther did not soften his characterization of the Pope as antichrist after the crisis had passed and he could feel reasonably secure under Frederick’s protection. Indeed, he expanded and strengthened this position. Of course, he could never feel...
Leo’s successor, Hadrian VI, warned Frederick that, unless he separated himself from Martin Luther “and put a muzzle on his blasphemous tongue,” church and state would jointly subject Frederick to both earthly punishment and eternal torment. “Repent therefore,” he said, “before you feel the two swords.” Later, in 1530, Pope Clement VII specifically ordered Emperor Charles V to “exterminate the evangelical heretics.”

The chief reason the mature Luther described the Pope as antichrist was because, in Luther’s opinion, he had usurped God’s place as lawmaker, adding his own rules to those in the Bible, burdening consciences with human traditions, and infringing on Christian freedom, declaring as sinful things that Christ has said are not sinful, including clerical marriage. Indeed, Luther said, the Pope had deposed Scripture and established his own laws, sitting in judgment on God’s Word and making decrees that oppose what Scripture says, nullifying the texts assuring us of forgiveness of sins, falsifying Christ’s words, falsely interpreting Scripture, diluting biblical mandates, and giving people a distorted picture of God. Rather than feeding Christ’s sheep, according to Luther, the Pope taught and did the very opposite of Christ’s life and teachings.

Luther charged that one way the Pope usurped God’s place was by teaching that the Scriptures derived their authority from the church rather than vice versa. Another way was by claiming authority not only over the church but over the whole world, judging everyone but not permitting himself to be judged. The Pope’s claim to divine prerogatives had “denied and utterly buried the commandments of God so that they might keep the traditions of men. We can also see this in the hostile monastery life and holy orders. There we find fasting, holiday-making, lying in hard beds, watching, keeping silent, wearing coarse clothes, being tontured and locked in a cell, being unmarried—and God has commanded none of these things.”

Rather than being subject to God, the antichrist exalted himself “above God’s Word and worship,” thus “sitting in judgment over God.”

The prophecies of Daniel, Matthew, and Revelation were also significant for Luther’s understanding of the papacy as antichrist usurping God’s prerogatives. Luther interpreted Daniel 2 and 7 as depicting four great empires, culminating with the Roman Empire, which would be divided, after which the antichrist would arise. His own generation, he believed, was symbolized by the toes in the image of Daniel. The little horn arising out of the Roman Empire he identified as the papal antichrist. Perhaps he was thinking of the prophecy that the little horn would “think to change times and laws” (Dan. 7:25, KJV) in his earlier statement that the Pope had no power to change what Christ has made.

Luther believed that Daniel 8, 11, and 12 contained blended prophecies applying to both Antiochus and the antichrist. He interpreted Daniel’s prophecy of a ruler who would “exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous
Leo’s successor, Hadrian VI, warned Frederick that, unless he separated himself from Martin Luther “and put a muzzle on his blasphemous tongue,” church and state would jointly subject Frederick to both earthly punishment and eternal torment. “Repent therefore,” he said, “before you feel the two swords.” Later, in 1530, Pope Clement VII specifically ordered Emperor Charles V to “exterminate the evangelical heretics.”

Leo’s successor, Hadrian VI, warned Frederick that, unless he separated himself from Martin Luther “and put a muzzle on his blasphemous tongue,” church and state would jointly subject Frederick to both earthly punishment and eternal torment. “Repent therefore,” he said, “before you feel the two swords.” Later, in 1530, Pope Clement VII specifically ordered Emperor Charles V to “exterminate the evangelical heretics.”

The chief reason the mature Luther described the Pope as antichrist was because, in Luther’s opinion, he had usurped God’s place as lawmaker, adding his own rules to those in the Bible, burdening consciences with human traditions, and infringing on Christian freedom, declaring as sinful things that Christ has said are not sinful, including clerical marriage. Indeed, Luther said, the Pope had deposed Scripture and established his own laws, sitting in judgment on God’s Word and making decrees that oppose what Scripture says, nullifying the texts assuring us of forgiveness of sins, distorting Christ’s words, falsely interpreting Scripture, diluting biblical mandates, and giving people a distorted picture of God. Rather than feeding Christ’s sheep, according to Luther, the Pope taught and did the very opposite of Christ’s life and teachings.

Luther charged that one way the Pope usurped God’s place was by teaching that the Scriptures derived their authority from the church rather than vice versa. Another way was by claiming authority not only over the church but over the whole world. “The false church is always the persecutor of the true church, not only spiritually . . . but also physically, by means of the sword and tyranny,” he said, declaring that the Bible had foretold that antichrist would “kill those who cling to the Word.”

Central to Luther’s understanding of the Pope as antichrist usurping God’s place was 2 Thessalonians 2:3 and 4. Noting that the villain in 2 Thessalonians 2 sits in God’s temple and exalts himself above God, Luther said, “The Antichrist took his seat in the church, yet not to govern it with divine laws, promises, and grace,” but with “his foolish and innumerable laws and altogether unnecessary traditions.”

Luther connected this passage with Matthew 15:3: “Paul tells the Thessalonians (2 Thess. 2:4) that the antichrist ‘exalts himself above every so-called god or object of worship’—surely by means of his self-invented holiness. Christ bears witness, Matt. 15:3, that the Jews transgress the commandments of God so that they might keep the traditions of men. We can also see this in the hostile monastery life and holy orders. There we find fasting, holiday-making, lying in hard beds, watching, keeping silent, wearing coarse clothes, being tonsured and locked in a cell, being unmarried—and God has commanded none of these things.”

Rather than being subject to God, the antichrist exalted himself “above God’s Word and worship,” thus “sitting in judgment over God.”

The prophecies of Daniel, Matthew, and Revelation were also significant for Luther’s understanding of the papacy as antichrist usurping God’s prerogatives. Luther interpreted Daniel 2 and 7 as depicting four great empires, culminating with the Roman Empire, which would be divided, after which the antichrist would arise. His own generation, he believed, was symbolized by the toes in the image of Daniel. The little horn arising out of the Roman Empire he identified as the papal antichrist. Perhaps he was thinking of the prophecy that the little horn would “think to change times and laws” (Dan. 7:25, KJV) in his earlier statement that the Pope had no power to change what Christ has made.

Luther believed that Daniel 8, 11, and 12 contained blended prophecies applying to both Antiochus and the antichrist. He interpreted Daniel’s prophecy of a ruler who would “exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods” and who would not “regard . . . the desire of women” (Dan. 11:36, 37, KJV) as referring to the papacy because of the Pope's ban on clerical marriage and his demand for obedience to himself and his rules rather than to God’s instruction.

Quoting Daniel 9:27 and 12:11, Jesus in Matthew 24:15 refers to the “abomination of desolation” spoken of by the prophet Daniel. Noting that the Pope had threatened burning to all who opposed him, Luther interpreted this text as follows: “The pope is a god on earth over everything heavenly, earthly, spiritual, and secular, and all on his own. No one is permitted to say to him: ‘What are you doing?’ That is the abomination and stench of which Christ speaks in Matthew 24.”

In other passages applying this text to the papacy, Luther said, “The desolating sacrilege stands in the holy place . . . and rules over us in the place of Christ” and “he has set up his own clergy, claiming that he was “imprinting on their souls an indelible character,” when in actuality he was imprinting them with “the mark of the beast in Revelation.”

Using the symbolism from Revelation 14, 17, and 18, Luther frequently referred to Rome as Babylon and the “scarlet whore of Babylon,” sometimes using these terms when discussing the papacy’s persecution of religious dissent. Calling Rome a “scarlet murderer,” Luther remembered the attempt to have him brought “as a prisoner to that murderous Jerusalem, that Babylon clothed in purple.” Declaring, “This Babylon in Rome burns Christ’s children,” he “praised and thanked” the Lord for rescuing him from “the scarlet whore.”

Negating Christ’s Sacrifice

Not only did the Roman antichrist usurp God’s prerogatives and persecute His people, according to Luther, but he also in effect negated Christ’s sacrifice and mediation. “Antichrist . . . abolishes grace and denies the blessings of Christ, our High Priest, who gave himself as a sacrifice for our sins,” he said. One way he did this was through the doctrine of merit. Said Luther, “The noxious notion of our own righteousness . . . was why we could not at all see Christ as the Mediator and Savior but simply supposed that He was a severe judge, who had to be placated by our works. This was to blaspheme Christ to the utmost and . . . to nullify the grace of God, to make Christ die to no purpose . . . And this is . . . the desolating sacrilege, standing in the holy place” (Matt. 24:15).

The doctrine that monks could justify themselves by “their hypocritical sanctity . . . , even though it is the proper function of Christ alone to justify the sinner” had, he said, “denied and completely suppressed the work of Christ and his divinity.” The blasphemy on the forehead of the scarlet whore he interpreted to be “the manifold, innumerable, self-chosen works or forms of worship” which were presented “as sacrifices in order to suppress Christ’s sacrifice.” Luther declared, “The chief article of the Christian doctrine is . . . that Christ is our righteousness. He who is now attacking this is taking the whole Christ away and is the true Antichrist.”

Luther said the papacy also negated Christ’s sacrifice by proclaiming the Mass to be “a sacrifice for the living and the dead,” obtaining “forgiveness of sins. . . . It is as though Christ had not done this very thing on the cross, as though his sacrifice had no validity and were of no value.” Luther suggested that these “daily repeated sacrifices” were “counterfeiting Christ” and purporting to do “that which Christ alone by his sacrifice once for all effected.”

Eschatology

Luther believed that the Bible foretold the church’s future and sug-
things against the God of gods” and who would not “regard... the desire of women” (Dan. 11:36, 37, KJV) as referring to the papacy because of the Pope’s ban on clerical marriage and his demand for obedience to himself and his rules rather than to God’s instruction.

Quoting Daniel 9:27 and 12:11, Jesus in Matthew 24:15 refers to the “abomination of desolation” spoken of by the prophet Daniel. Noting that the Pope had threatened burning to all who opposed him, Luther interpreted this text as follows: “The pope is a god on earth over everything heavenly, earthly, spiritual, and secular, and all on his own. No one is permitted to say to him: ‘What are you doing?’ That is the abomination and stench of which Christ speaks in Matthew 24.”

In other passages applying this text to the papacy, Luther said, “The desolating sacrilege stands in the holy place... and rules over us in the place of Christ” and “he has set up his own law for God’s law and his own priesthood for Christ’s priesthood; and thus set abomination in the holy place. ”

Luther also found predictions of the antichrist in the Book of Revelation, especially chapters 13 and 17. In Revelation 13, he was the lamblike beast, appearing “to be Christian,” yet speaking “like the devil,” preaching the doctrines of “the dragon from hell.” Usurping Christ’s role as high priest, Luther said, the Pope had set up his own clergy, claiming that he was “imprinting on their souls an indelible character,” when in actuality he was imprinting them with “the mark of the beast in Revelation.”

Using the symbolism from Revelation 14, 17, and 18, Luther frequently referred to Rome as Babylon and the “scarlet whore of Babylon,” sometimes using these terms when discussing the papacy’s persecution of religious dissent. Calling Rome a “scarlet murderess,” Luther remembered the attempt to have him brought “as a prisoner to that murderous Jerusalem, that Babylon clothed in purple.” Declaring, “This Babylon in Rome burns Christ’s children,” he “praised and thanked” the Lord for rescuing him from “the scarlet whore.”

Negating Christ’s Sacrifice

Not only did the Roman antichrist usurp God’s prerogatives and persecute His people, according to Luther, but he also in effect negated Christ’s sacrifice and mediation. “Antichrist... abolishes grace and denies the blessings of Christ, our High Priest, who gave himself as a sacrifice for our sins,” he said. One way he did this was through the doctrine of merit. Said Luther, “The noxious notion of our own righteousness... was why we could not at all see Christ as the Mediator and Savior but simply supposed that He was a severe judge, who had to be placated by our works. This was to blaspheme Christ to the utmost and... to nullify the grace of God, to make Christ die to no purpose... And this is... the desolating sacrilege, standing in the holy place” (Matt. 24:15).

The doctrine that monks could justify themselves by “their hypocritical sanctity... even though it is the proper function of Christ alone to justify the sinner” had, he said, “denied and completely suppressed the work of Christ and his divinity.” The blasphemy on the forehead of the scarlet whore he interpreted to be “the manifold, innumerable, self-chosen works or forms of worship” which were presented “as sacrifices in order to suppress Christ’s sacrifice.” Luther declared, “The chief article of the Christian doctrine... that Christ is our righteousness. He who is now attacking this is taking the whole Christ away and is the true Antichrist.”

Luther said the papacy also negated Christ’s sacrifice by proclaiming the Mass to be “a sacrifice for the living and the dead,” obtaining “forgiveness of sins... It is as though Christ had not done this very thing on the cross, as though his sacrifice had no validity and were of no value.” Luther suggested that these “daily repeated sacrifices” were “counterfeiting Christ” and purporting to do “that which Christ alone by his sacrifice once for all effected.”
gested that the time of judgment predicted in Daniel 7:8-10 was taking place during his lifetime. Affirming that his own teachings were those of “the ancient and true church at the time of the apostles,” he thought the little horn was being judged as “the original and ancient church” shone “forth once more (like the sun emerging from the clouds behind which it [had been] shining but where it could not be seen).” He found comfort in the prophecies that the last days would be shortened for the sake of the church at the time of the apostles, and falsehood. “47” He found comfort in the prophecies that the last days would be shortened for the sake of the godly and “that the church would be preserved and Antichrist [would] be destroyed. This would be done, according to other passages, “without human hands,” with the breath of Christ’s mouth, “slaying him with spiritual preaching” before destroying him “by his glorious”—and even “a true werewolf.”49

Luther’s Final Year
The intensity of Luther’s attacks on the papacy increased during 1545, the final year of his life. That year, in his preface to a compilation of his complete works, he described the Pope not only as antichrist but also as the devil’s vicar. His final and most acerbic attack, Against the Roman Papacy, An Institution of the Devil, was written at the request of Elector John Frederick. It was a response to two letters from Pope Paul III forbidding the emperor from calling a German National Council to settle the religious disputes within the empire. Three times in this publication Luther referred to the Pope as “the most hollow father.” He denounced him as a “teacher of lies, blasphemies, and idolatries,” a murderer of kings, an inciter to all kinds of bloodshed, and “a brothel-keeper above all brothel-keepers and all vermin”—and even “a true werewolf.”50

Were such attacks unchristian? Luther didn’t think so. Earlier, he denied that it was sinful to refute Satan’s “reviling against godliness and God himself.” They must, he said, “be exposed and refuted” so the people could “be corrected and liberated from the tyranny of Satan.” Paul’s attacks on “the false apostles” were not slander: he was “judging them by his apostolic authority.” Likewise, when Luther called the Pope antichrist, he said, he was “judging . . . by divine authority” on the basis of Galatians 1:8.

It can be argued, however, that although Luther was antipapal, he was not anti-Catholic. He opposed the dictatorial monarchial episcopate at the head of the church, not the church itself.

By the time of Luther’s death, other voices had joined him in proclaiming that the Pope was the antichrist, including both his friend and disciple Philip Melanchthon and a man for whom he had little respect, Ulrich Zwingli.

Other contemporaries of Luther who shared his belief about the papal antichrist included John Calvin, John Knox, and Thomas Cranmer. Among the later reformers who held this view were the Anabaptist Menno Simons and various Huguenot theologians. Even King James I of England got into the act, writing an exposition of the Book of Revelation that called Rome the seat of the antichrist and Babylon. Many of the foundational creeds of Protestantism, including the Formula of Concord, the Second Scottish Confession, the Westminster Confession, the Savoy Declaration of the Congregational Churches, and the Baptist Confession of 1688, echoed Luther’s belief on this subject.

Conclusion
Luther’s conflict with church authorities over the financial exploitation of his parishioners through indulgences led to papal attempts to silence the independent-minded monk. He first began to suspect that the papacy was the antichrist when its representatives resorted to power plays rather than appealing to Scripture, supported the execution of dissenters, and—long before it became official dogma—claimed papal infallibility. He became sure of his position when the Pope himself threatened Luther with excommunication, pressured rulers to silence him, and ordered the extermination of his followers.

But Luther’s antichrist theology was the result of biblical analysis as well as personal experience. The key theological reason for Luther’s position was his belief that the Pope was in many ways usurping God’s place and negating Christ’s sacrifice.

Clearly, Luther’s position on the antichrist is no longer politically correct. It is out of sync with the groupthink of the 21st century. However, with so great a number of voices stretching back so many centuries who courageously asserted that the papacy was the antichrist, the question for us should not be, Is this position embarrassing or is it politically correct or socially acceptable? Rather, it should be, Is this position biblically correct? This view was not politically correct in Luther’s day. And in Luther’s day, unlike ours, this opinion could have been literally fatal for the person holding it, as it was for John Huss and Thomas Cranmer.
gested that the time of judgment predicted in Daniel 7:8-10 was taking place during his lifetime. Affirming that his own teachings were those of “the ancient and true church at the time of the apostles,” he thought the little horn was being judged as “the original and ancient church” shone “forth once more (like the sun emerging from the clouds behind which it [had been] shining but where it could not be seen).” He found comfort in the prophecies that the last days would be shortened for the sake of the gospel, dictating that the spiritual papacy was followed by a voice preaching the angel’s message of Revelation 14, the church “shone” forth once more “without human hands,” with the breath of Christ’s mouth, “slaying Satan’s ‘reviling against godliness and God himself.’ They must, he said, ‘be exposed and refuted’ so the people could “be corrected and liberated from the tyranny of Satan.”

Paul’s attacks on “the false apostles” were not slander: he was “judging them by his apostolic authority.” Likewise, when Luther called the Pope antichrist, he said, he was “judging . . . by divine authority” on the basis of Galatians 1:8.

It can be argued, however, that although Luther was antipapal, he was not anti-Catholic. He opposed the dictatorial monarchical episcopate at the head of the church, not the church itself. By the time of Luther’s death, other voices had joined him in proclaiming that the Pope was the antichrist, including both his friend and disciple Philip Melanchthon and a man for whom he had little respect, Ulrich Zwingli.

Other contemporaries of Luther who shared his belief about the papal antichrist included John Calvin, John Knox, and Thomas Cranmer. Among the later reformers who held this view were the Anabaptist Menno Simons and various Huguenot theologians. Even King James I of England got into the act, writing an exposition of the Book of Revelation that called Rome the seat of the antichrist and Babylon. Many of the foundational creeds of Protestantism, including the Formula of Concord, the Second Scottish Confession, the Savoy Declaration of the Congregational Churches, and the Baptist Confession of 1688, echoed Luther’s belief on this subject.

Conclusion
Luther’s conflict with church authorities over the financial exploitation of his parishioners through indulgences led to papal attempts to silence the independent-minded monk. He first began to suspect that the papacy was the antichrist when its representatives resorted to power plays rather than appealing to Scripture, supported the execution of dissidents, and—long before it became official dogma—claimed papal infallibility. He became sure of his position when the Pope himself threatened Luther with excommunication, pressured rulers to silence him, and ordered the extermination of his followers.

But Luther’s antichrist theology was the result of biblical analysis as well as personal experience. The key theological reason for Luther’s position was his belief that the Pope was in many ways usurping God’s place and negating Christ’s sacrifice.

Clearly, Luther’s position on the antichrist is no longer politically correct. It is out of sync with the groupthink of the 21st century. However, with so great a number of voices stretching back so many centuries who courageously asserted that the papacy was the antichrist, the question for us should not be, Is this position embarrassing or is it politically correct or socially acceptable? Rather, it should be, Is this position biblically correct? This view was not politically correct in Luther’s day. And in Luther’s day, unlike ours, this opinion could have been literally fatal for the person holding it, as it was for John Huss and Thomas Cranmer.
Arguments over the “union of church and state” include a connection between the two or a separation of the two, both for mutual benefit. With respect to a connection, the Judeo-Christian heritage offers an advantage to the state, compared to atheism, in upholding biblical values. At the same time, the church is advantaged by tax exemption, protection of property, recognition of ministers and marriages, and freedom to preach religious liberty. With respect to separation, both state and church are free from the potential temptation to repress the other, with the state as neutral (not favoring one religion over another). The state is free to legislate in civil matters, and all citizens are free to follow the dictates of their conscience.

Here are two major views on the relationship of church and state in America: (1) when religion is not al-

http://digitalcommons.andrews.edu/pd/vol13/iss2/1