10-2003

Fostering Positive Body Image in Girls

Susan E. Murray

Andrews University

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.andrews.edu/luh-pubs

Part of the Social and Behavioral Sciences Commons

Recommended Citation

https://digitalcommons.andrews.edu/luh-pubs/768

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Lake Union Herald at Digital Commons @ Andrews University. It has been accepted for inclusion in Lake Union Herald by an authorized administrator of Digital Commons @ Andrews University. For more information, please contact repository@andrews.edu.
Now You can read the uniqueness of each individual, the thin type of beauty. Girls nine and 10 fit the "standard" of an unrealistically "ideal body," and most bodies don't of what society's standards are for the how he or she looks. Pre-adolescent people react to a child's body and body image is influenced by how even thinner than their ideal weight. than they really were, they wanted to be only did girls perceive themselves as heavier and mental ill health. Peterson found that not including poor eating patterns, preoccupation with food and self, extreme dieting, lower self-esteem, drug and alcohol abuse, and general physical and mental ill health. Peterson found that not only did girls perceive themselves as heavier than they really were, they wanted to be even thinner than their ideal weight.

We know that even in childhood body image is influenced by how people react to a child’s body and how he or she looks. Pre-adolescent girls are becoming increasingly aware of what society’s standards are for the “ideal body,” and most bodies don’t fit the “standard” of an unrealistically thin type of beauty. Girls nine and 10 years old are trying to lose weight, and many have already tried dieting. Over the past 30 years, the number of dieting women has risen by 300 percent, and the number of dieting girls has jumped by a staggering 1,300 percent. For the majority of grandmothers, mothers, and daughters today, the increasing pressure for thinness has caused an almost universal transfer of poor body image and weight struggles. Now spanning three generations, this is a very serious concern.

I invite you to consider these ideas:

► Model acceptance and appreciation of your own body, or at least avoid making comments about your own body in front of your child.

► Affirm your daughter for who she is, as well as for what she can do and what she looks like. The more secure she is in who she is, the less vulnerable she will be in thinking her self-worth depends on her appearance.

► Limit the amount and type of media your daughter watches, uses, or reads. Have conversations with her to help her develop a critical awareness of the images and messages we receive from the media. Be sure your child sees images of a whole range of real people, not just the ones commonly found in the media.

► Share the characteristics that make up a positive, caring, and successful person.

► Use Scripture to guide your discussions:

1 Samuel 16:7—People look at outward appearance, but the Lord looks at the heart.

Psalm 139:14—I praise you because I am fearfully and wonderfully made.

Luke 12:7—The very hairs on your head are numbered. Anytime you talk about the human body, the uniqueness of each individual, the wonders of the brain and how it develops, remember that God is so amazing beyond our comprehension, and we are amazing, too!

Romans 12:1—Offer our bodies as living sacrifices. Caring for our bodies is an act of spirituality. We can help our girls focus on being smart and healthy by recognizing both their inner and outer beauty.

1 Corinthians 12—parts of the body. This text can be used to consider how every one has important gifts to contribute to one’s church, home, school, family, and community.

1 M. Peterson, American Journal of Healthy Behavior, July–August 2003.